However, the Dolphins know they could lose some impact players for the rest of the season while they decide how many significant contributors they want to return. This is the time of year, when patience needs to be exercised. There is no assurance the Dolphins can keep these players all together, and players have shown they may be willing to listen to different teams. The Dolphins still have plenty of cap space and have no trade restrictions on a large segment of their roster. It's a clear-cut time to make deals. Miami should be looking for immediate help on defense and help at the quarterback position, but they should also be looking at incremental moves on the offensive side of the ball, while making a much closer examination of their wide receivers. As expected, the Dolphins have not signed their own rookies who have been drafted by them. That doesn't mean they won't sign them, but it is a clear indication they are not looking to make their own coaching staff even more frustrated. That said, if they do sign a rookie, it will probably be for the practice squad. When it comes to free agency, the Dolphins have been patient so far. Not as patient as they were in 2012, but still patient. The team has given themselves the ability to add quality defensive tackles and a suitable backup quarterback. They are in no hurry to make those moves, but they understand they need help on their offensive line and at wide receiver. One of the big questions is whether or not they are going to spend the money that is likely to become available in free agency. The team did exceed the salary cap in 2015. Most will agree the team is a better team this season than last, but there are also arguments for the Dolphins being a $20 million over the cap after paying for all of its draft picks last season. Free agency begins in March. Plenty of players will become available, but Miami needs to be careful in how they make a big splash. Those close to the situation say the team will look at fewer big d0c515b9f4
